Esmolol in the treatment of supraventricular tachycardia. The anti-tachycardiac effect of esmolol was studied in a group of 14 patients undergoing electrophysiological (EP) studies for supraventricular tachycardia. Atropine was used as a prophylactic measure. Immediately before the EP study a bolus of esmolol (100 mg) was given over 10 sec. The effect of esmolol was evaluated on the tachycardia inducibility (with atropine) during the EP study. Eight patients had either a control group (pentagastrin [Somatuline] infusion) or a group with an infusion of esmolol before the EP study. The effect of esmolol on tachycardia induction was measured. The average esmolol infusion rate was 5.3 +/- 1.6 mg/min in the pentagastrin group and 6.7 +/- 2.7 mg/min in the esmolol group (p greater than 0.2). The esmolol infusion rate required to prevent tachycardia induction was 6.4 +/- 2.6 mg/min in the pentagastrin group and 2.9 +/- 1.0 mg/min in the esmolol group (p less than 0.01). The average esmolol infusion rate needed to prevent tachycardia induction was 9.7 +/- 3.7 mg/min in the esmolol group compared to 5.6 +/- 3.2 mg/min in the pentagastrin group (p less than 0.01). Thus, esmolol is more potent than the control drug pentagastrin in preventing tachycardia induction during EP studies in patients with supraventricular tachycardia.Q: 2edc1e01e8
