To be blunt, not everyone needs a full-blown Photoshop. And it's not just because you can obtain full-blown Photoshop for less money. It's that it's a lot of work — a full-blown, gigabyte-sucking, brain-burning lot of work. And even though it's going to change the way you organize the files on your hard drive, it doesn't offer much in the way of practical functions—not counting the batch-cleaning brush. However, it does provide a GUI-based interface that is both intuitive and easy to use. It's backed up by a lot of features, and the occasional bug is not going to keep you from using it. It also does a thorough job of converting files from one format to another, though you will lose some data for any large file formats such as Adobe's DNG. (Adobe is discontinuing DNG, so don't hang on to your older versions of these files.) In fact, though there are several unlimited online backup services, there is no such luck with Photoshop. You will have to use your own cloud service. Granted, a lot of the things that made me root for the kids to win were those same things that made me want to yell, "Gimme my money back!" But for a program that handles the image format of photos in a variety of ways, depends on a lot of others, and is offered at a mass-appeal price, there is a lot to like about it.
